Physiopathologic and clinical

aspects]. Doppler sonography is able to detect and measure the velocity of flow in an artery. In the vicinity of an aneurysm, hypokinetic and turbulent flow is detected. This is a consequence of the reduced elasticity of the aneurysm wall. The most common applications are the detection and quantitative determination of vasospasms after subarachnoid hemorrhage. In vasospasm, flow disturbances can be measured within 4 hours of onset. The examination can usually be performed rapidly after the infusion of an ultrasound contrast agent. Even when mild, vasospasms are hemodynamically relevant, because they can provoke ischemic attacks, and transient focal neurological deficits, or they can impair the cerebral vasoreactivity. Although the specificity of the method is lower than angiography and transcranial Doppler sonography, this diagnostic technique is easily performed and safer than
