patient who is not happy with the care he/she has received from a General Practitioner could seek to make a complaint to the Health Complaints Commission. Confidentiality General Practitioners are bound by law and have a duty to keep confidential all matters that arise in the course of their professional practice. However, the Health Complaints Commission Act 1996 and the Privacy Act 1988 do not apply to patients who consult General Practitioners in the course of their professional services. Therefore, General Practitioners are free to discuss the matters arising with a patient without hindering that person's ability to bring a complaint to the Commission. Right of Reply General Practitioners have the right of reply to complaints, except in respect of complaints about adverse medical treatment. General Practitioners have an obligation to take reasonable steps to deal with the complaints received in the course of their practice. However, if a General Practitioner wishes to respond to a complaint about adverse medical treatment they are able to do so only after receiving a response from the Health Complaints Commission. This right of reply is to be supplied by the Commission.

Inquiries The Health Complaints Commission may write to a General Practitioner to find out whether there are complaints about them. General Practitioners are entitled to object to inquiries to their Practice for a non-pecuniary purpose. The Health Complaints Commission will respect this objection. Inquiries to a General Practitioner are restricted to complaints or to complaints of adverse medical treatment.

Patients' Rights General Practitioners have an obligation to give adequate information to patients. If General Practitioners are required to give patients information by Health Complaints Commission, the General Practitioners are not obliged to give information unless the Patients' Rights Act 1989 says they must. General Practitioners have an obligation to ensure their patients are given information about medical tests and treatments.

Clinical Comparative Study of Fraxiparin and a Synthetic Heparin in Total Hip

Arthroplasty. This study compared the clinical efficacy of the low-molecular-weight heparin, fraxiparin (Fragmin(®)), compared with unfractionated heparin (UFH) for hip replacement. Fifty patients scheduled for total hip replacement were assigned to two groups: fraxiparin group (n = 25) and UFH group (n = 25). Patients were checked for coagulation, liver enzymes, and white blood cell (WBC) counts. The length of hospital stay and the incidence of deep vein thrombosis were compared between the two groups. The fraxiparin group showed a significant shorter duration of the hospital stay (p = 0.004) and fewer patients suffered
